

Which existing websites out there most inspired your web site design thus far?

These two websites have been the most influential on my design. It's hard to get the whole layout in just a screenshot, but there is a general feel.

Which parts of the design are you most proud of?

I really enjoy the simplicity of both designs. They are simple, yet they aren't boring. They have easy to read typography and attention grabbing objects.

There is also no question as to what these companies actually do after looking at these websites. That is what I wanted to incorporate into my websites design. I wanted it very simple and so that it didn't overwhelm anybody who is looking at the website.

What struggles did you encounter in your design process?

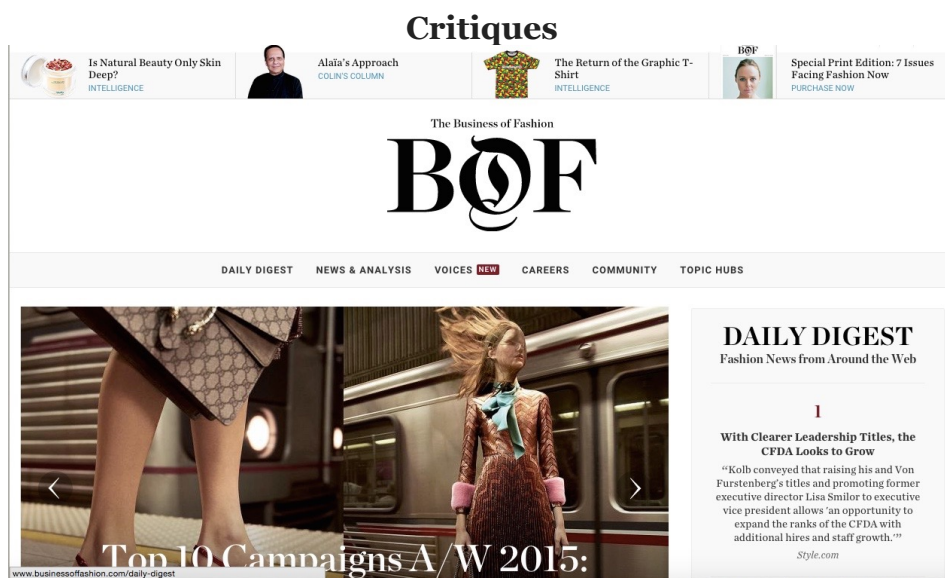

The main struggle I had is trying to separate myself from what preferences I wanted and what would make it user friendly for the specific audience using the website. I also got stuck in a rut when first designing and had to step away so I could think of different designs as well.

Which struggles did you encounter during page development?

The main struggles were just working through the kinks of making my first website. Knowing when to use certain tags or how to make design elements work. Also working with images has been a struggle, but we covered that this week. So I'm sure that will help.

What did you learn from making your project responsive?

I learned what were the main aspects of the website that need to have even as easy access in the mobile website. I also learned that the flow is important to make fluid as the size of the screen changes and there shouldn't be any major "hiccups".

Group 1: I really enjoyed a lot of aspects of all the different websites in group one. This one stuck out to me for many reasons though. This one had eye catching logo that just started the rest of the flow for your eyes through the website. There is just enough white space, but not too much that things seem separated from each other. I like that they used a serif font, it is what I picture when it comes to newspapers and websites. Yet, the serif font they used is easy to read and had enough spacing between the letters so they don't blend together.

Group 2: The first critique I would have here is the heading typography and color choice. What they chose makes it hard to read what it actually says and doesn't really stand out. I like the four main pictures they chose. I don't really know why they picked those pictures because I don't know what the website is for from looking at this. Once you hover over the images they have something you can click or explain why, but they need something to let people know to that's what they need to do.
